

Andrew deLaski

Executive Director
Appliance Standards Awareness Project

Since 1998, Andrew has been the Executive Director of the Appliance Standards Awareness Project, a consumer, environmental, state government and utility company coalition dedicated to advancing cost-effective appliance and equipment efficiency standards. At ASAP, he advises state policy makers and advocates interested in state level energy efficiency standards policy and he coordinates national advocacy efforts related to federal efficiency standards. He has co-authored and updated periodic national and state studies on savings potential from new appliance standards. Previously, he worked at the Consortium for Energy Efficiency and the State Public Interest Research Groups. He holds a Masters of Public Policy from the University of Michigan (1995) and a B.A. in economics from the University of Virginia (1988).
